

The Yang Taw vine (Actinidia chinensis) bearing a single immature fruit; the first to be produced in America.

The vine was trained over the porch of a private house at Chico, California, and produced a number of fruits.

When trained high allowing only a single stem to grow and form a trunk and the leafy branches to spread out over a pergola this rank growing vine produces a very satisfactory shade.

This fruit never reached maturity, so that at present, we are unable to corroborate the statements of travellers in China who claim the fruit is of considerable value for jams and preserves. Photograph by R. L. Beagles, October 1915.
